Unconditional Life: The Postwar International Law ...

This chapter looks at some examples of how public language emerging out of the Cold War builds on the idea of an 'unconditional life'. Because the logical conclusion of an accelerated technology is the endangerment of biological human life, language in the international domain encounters an impasse, or what can be described as a 'crisis of modern nihilism'.

The word itself is used in various guises in international law—for example, the demand by the Allied forces to Japan for an ‘unconditional surrender’—and its use carries a number of implications. In this book, however, the term is used to describe a fantasy at work in the structure and rhetoric of international law.
